2. What obstacle did the builders of the Empire State Building face regarding dirigible docking? Write a small paragraph.

The builders of the Empire State Building encountered significant challenges when they attempted to accommodate dirigible docking at the top of the structure. The architect couldn't simply place a mooring mast on the building's flat roof, as the dirigible would be anchored by a single cable, creating immense stress on the building's frame. This stress, combined with wind pressure, needed to be transferred safely to the foundation, necessitating extensive modifications to the building's steel frame. These modifications, costing over sixty thousand dollars, were required to strengthen the structure specifically to support the dirigible, rather than addressing other factors like natural wind forces. As a result, the building's design had to be centered around this mooring mast, illustrating the complexity and costliness of integrating such an ambitious feature.

3. Is laughter important in a relationship express your ideas

Laughter is a vital part of any relationship. In my experience, whether with friends, family, or a significant other, laughter has always played a crucial role. One of my closest friendships is with Person1, and it's built on shared laughter and good times. For example, last year, we went to Snow Peak with some friends, and during the trip, I tore a ligament in my knee while attempting to jump onto Person2's quad. Despite the injury, we couldn't help but laugh at how ridiculous the situation was, and we joked about it with our friends. From the moment we first met, I made Person1 laugh, and our bond has only grown stronger since then. Laughter brings people closer, strengthens relationships, and creates lasting memories, making it an essential element in all my relationships.
